PRINCIPAL'S COMMUNIQUE

Research skills, such as the knowledge and skills necessary to pose clear (scientific) questions, to critically review the literature, and to collect, analyze, and interpret data, are important to navigate the complexity of daily life. This is also true for teachers, where research skills and increasingly seen as important elements of professionalism and the establishment of evidence-based teaching practices. Competence in research methods is a major contribution to (future) teachers' professionalism. In the pedagogical approach, which we call the Teaching Clinic, combining service-learning and design-based research to create meaningful learning engagements. The Teaching Clinic (TC) is a course for Master students in a teacher education curriculum at an Austrian university. Established teachers submit research questions about current professional challenges. These questions are then picked up by students, who conceptualize and execute research projects to find evidence based solutions.

Education is for improving the lives of others and for leaving your community and world better than you found it.
